SARAH BERNHARDT.

William Winter's Criticism of Her.

From the New York Tribune.

The eminent foreign player was welcomed with eager plaudits of gladness and admiration by a sparkling, alert, and numerous audience—the handsome theatre being crowded to its limits—and she gave a performance remarkable for the dexterity and finish of its mechanism and for its sample revelation of those personal peculiarities that have inspired and long retained the devotion of her admirers.

The supple figure, the nervous force, the incessant yet reposeful and beautifully molded action, the unerring fitness of expressive gesture, the wealth of capricious wiles, the melody of voice, the vehement loquacity and the abundant resources of craft and of fury in moments of sudden theatrical transition—all these equipments and felicities of her exceptional personality and her authoritative art remain unimpaired and entirely at her command. She was evidentity touched by the ments and felicities of her exceptional personality and her authoritative art remain unimpaired and entirely at her comand. She was evidently touched by the cordiality of the public greeting, and, in her mood of responsive sensibility, she acted with unusual animation and with a more expeditious artistic zeal than it has always been customary for her to exhibit. She is unquestionably a women of unique character and of great talents; and as such, and notwithstanding that her influence upon the stage and upon the dramatic profession has been almost universally harmful, she may be seen and studied with interest and benefit. The propensity to look upon Sara Bernhardt as a prodigious, and wonderful, and incomparable, and transcendent actress, indeed, ought not to be encouraged. It was the unwholesome product of notoriety, and it is a part of that folly which declares all art that is foreign, and especially all acting that is French, to be naturally and intrinsically better than our own.

Sarah Bernhardt is an accomplished artist, but she has never reached, and she never will reach, the height that was occupied on the American stage by Charlotte Cushman, and that is occupied on the English stage by Ellen Terry. Yet, according to her nature and within her limitations, the French actress is one of the powers of this period, and not to be ignored in any thoughtful estimate of the dramatic forces that affect society and tinge the current of contemporary thought.

Von Nerta, at the request of Goenner & Co., made an examination of the wall. The latter in his report says if the new building is used for the purpose intended, a factory, and the east wall, which is nine inches, of house No. 328 is made use of, that wall will be subjected to a weight of 17,800 pounds to the lineal foot, while its carrying strength is only 0,400 pounds.
